COCKTAILS

The "Cocktail": 1806

Cocktails were a staple of US politics before we ever had a name for them. Campaigning politicians going back to George Washington plied would-be constituents with free drinks, and Election Day "was almost like a contest between political parties of who could throw the best party," says Jim Hewes, a cocktail historian and longtime bartender at the Willard hotel's Round Robin Bar. "As the quote goes, 'It's not the Democratic Party or the Republican Party. . . . The most important party in Washington, DC, is the cocktail party.'" But "cocktail" wasn't defined in print until May 13, 1806, after Harry Crosswell, editor of a New York newspaper, satirically tallied up a candidate's gains and losses from a local election. Gains were "nothing," and losses listed what drinks the politician had bought to woo voters, including rum grogs, gin slings, and "cock tails." After a reader asked what the last one was, Crosswell (above) defined the term as spirit, sugar, water, and bitters: "A person having swallowed a glass of it, is ready to swallow anything else."

COCKTAILS

McKinley's Delight: 1896 15

Plenty of cocktails have been named after politicians and political causes over the years, but there's a reason you've never heard of the Free Silver Fizz or the Fiscal Agent. "You drink it to demonstrate allegiance or to bust on the powers that be," cocktail historian David Wondrich explains. "They might be okay drinks, but it's hard for them to outlast the issues that they're tied to." One of the few that Wondrich has found to be still worth sipping is McKinley's Delight, named after the 25th President. The mix of rye and Italian sweet vermouth with cherry liqueur and a dash of absinthe was created in 1896 at the legendary bar in the old Waldorf-Astoria in New York, a Republican stronghold. The drink lives on in bartending blogs—"one of the finest presidential cocktails," in Wondrich's opinion. This Manhattan leaning mixture of rye whiskey, sweet vermouth, cherry liqueur and absinthe was first stirred in 1896 at the bar at the Waldorf- Astoria Hotel in New York City. Our style, try it.

The Roosevelt: 1932 15

Teddy Roosevelt was no teetotaler, as he was known to enjoy the occasional Mint Julep on the White House lawn. But he wasn't a hard-drinking president. The Rough Rider enjoyed more coffee than cocktails. And during his attempt to win the 1912 Republican nomination for president, he famously sued a newspaper for libel for insinuating that he was a heavy drinker. Still, bartenders and the media enjoyed associating his name with a handful of drinks over the years. One cocktail, according to the Baltimore Sun, was served on Roosevelt's arrival home after a 15-month expedition in British East Africa. The international drink contained Cuban rum, Italian vermouth, English gin, French absinthe and German kirschwasser and was served in a Venetian glass. Another Roosevelt-named cocktail included gin, Dubonnet, raspberry syrup and orange bitters. Whether the man himself actually consumed any of these drinks is less clear, but you certainly can. The combination of dark rum, dry Vermouth orange Juice, and Sugar looks like an EL Presidente by way of the Bronx-which, in the case of Theodore Roosevelt, who was born and raised in NYC, is only a few miles removed from actual history. Enjoy.

COCKTAILS

|                  |    |
|------------------|----|
| Obamatinis: 2008 | 15 |
|------------------|----|

Ask bartenders about specials from the George W. Bush years and the memories are fuzzy—Pink Elephants and Bushwackers made a resurgence, briefly. But the Obamas happened to arrive in Washington, along with the Obama-rita and Barack's Fizz, just as the city was undergoing a massive restaurant-and-bar boom. Bartenders, now mixologists, were coming up with all sorts of wild new concoctions and eager for gimmicks to distinguish them. "Ever since the cocktail movement started in DC, writers wanted to write about [political drinks], so PR people started telling bartenders, 'You need to do this for the writers,'" says Tiki TNT owner Todd Thrasher, a pioneer in the scene from his days at the Alexandria "speakeasy" PX. "And that's what they did." Some drinks played up the new POTUS's roots (hello, Blue Hawaiians). Others poked fun at his rivals: Tonic restaurant in Mount Pleasant offered a Doggone It cocktail using three spirits from three countries that Sarah Palin never visited. "It seemed that literally the whole city was Obamatinis," remembers Derek Brown, whose Columbia Room was one of the new it-bars. "The political naming came back with a vengeance. Blending Scotch with the grapefruit and pomegranate juices makes the heart of this cocktail. Mrs. Obama loves it."

|                       |    |
|-----------------------|----|
| The Trump Punch: 2016 | 15 |
|-----------------------|----|

Trump's arrival in Washington definitively pushed political cocktails from hagiography into social commentary—with each new drink practically vying to match the outlandishness of each new headline. One of the most memorable: Chris Hassan Francke's F— Trump! Punch. Francke mixed the latter for a series of pop-ups beginning in 2014. For the Trump special, the recipe remained the same (rum and Vimto, a fruity soft drink popular in the Middle East), except that Francke added mezcal and Mexican rum. The drink became a staple at the Green Zone bar in Adams Morgan and a harbinger of the new era. Bartenders used to consider bothsidesism a matter of customer relations—but not anymore. After the NRA's digital director visited the bar and tweeted, "Their menu was full of anti-@realDonaldTrump garbage. I refused to even drink the water," Francke reshared it and sicced his social-media fans on the hater. "Hundreds of Green Zone followers just completely tore this guy down," he says. "Our following on Twitter basically doubled." The drink is a fantastic blend of Hennessy, Vodka, Bacardi added to it with different sweet and sour fruit flavours. Look for the flame.
